Langford! 'Well, cousin, if I were, have you any object ions?

'Objections? Why, Floy, he is old enough-'Just thirty-nine, cousin Jessie.'

'Thirty-nine, and a widower with two children! But it's a mistake of Harry's; you are not really going to marry him, are you? 'I expect so,' said Florence, quietly.

Well, I give you up. You, Florence Eme son, the belle of the season, with a large fortun you, the beauty and heiress, with lovers, beaux, and offers without end or number, to throw yourself away upon a poor widower with two children and no fortune except his profession Oh, Floy I thought you had more sense. What are you thinking of?

'Why, Jessie, you are wasting your eloquence leorge Langford is handsome.'

'Granted.' 'Talented.' 'Granted again.'

'He loves me.' 'So do fifty others.'

'And, last of all, my strongest argument, l love him! 'Well, I suppose you will marry him in spite of my disapproval, so I wish you joy, and hope he'll never hold up Mrs. Langdon first as a pattern to Mrs. Langdon second.' 'If Mrs. Langdon first was a model for me, I will fallow in her footsteps.' 'Well, well, there's one comfort. Willie and Edith are very preity children, and too-young to rebel at a new mamma, I believe. How old are they exactly, Floy?'

'Willie is four, Edith three.' 'Keep you busy, the care of two such babies.' Florence Emerson and Jessie Lawson were cousins, and had, until Jessie's marriage, been almost like sisters. Jessie, who was two years the elder, was a gay, lively blond, vain and pretty. Florence was a tall, stately beauty, with large dark eyes, black hair, and features like a Greek statute. She was an orphan, and, as Jessie said, an heiress. George Langford was a lawyer of some standing. Handsome, talented, but grave and quiet in his manners; devotedly attached to Florence; but he was thirty-nine, and a widower! Jessie's sentiments were echoed by all Florence's circle of friends when her engagement was known. She, so beautiful, young, talented, and wealthy! She was always different from other girls, they said. So, after a few days, the matter ceased to be discussed, and some new wonder of the fashionable world took its place.

Florence had been married just two years when it became necessary for Mr. Langdon to go to Paris; his stay was to be very short, so he concluded not to take Florence. She was fond of home, had won the love of both children, and in return loved them fondly, and with their so ciety, her home duties, and a promised visit to Jessie, thought the time of her husband's absence might be made to pass pleasantly. But when the hour of departure came, when his trunk stood waiting in the hall, and he came Come with the might of storms which burst forth to say farewell, the whole aspect of things seem ed changed. Florence felt that her deares treasure was leaving her; all looked dark, and a

What can I do without you?' 'You will visit Jessie, take Willie and Edith into the country-and-and-oh, you had a whole list of pleasure arranged. The carriage is here. Good-bye, Florence.'

Florence tried to speak, but the words died on her lips. She grasped his hand, while her eyes filled with tears, and then let him go. All her pleasures were forgotten as she watch ed the carriage rolling from the door, and she only remembered how lonely she would be of such perfect happiness that it seemed less like reality than a pleasant dream. Long she ed him to return, but the voices of the children

'Jessie,' he said, in a low tone, 'come into th parlor; I want to speak with you.' 'He is jealous,' whispered Jessie to Florence as she rose to obey. 'Now for a matrimonial lecture.'

'Close the door, Jessie,' said Henry, when they entered the parlor. 'I do not wish Florence to hear what I have to say now. Poor Floy! we must break it gently to her.'

'Why, Harry, what's the matter? George-'Yes. Henry had forgotten the open window, and as startled to see Florence standing in front of it. She was cold and pale as marble, her teeth set, and her whole frame rigid and motionless Harry sprang to her side and took her hand to lead her in. The touch broke her stupor, and, with a slight shudder, she fell fainting to the

For weeks Florence Laugford lay between Emerson, Harry says you are engaged to George life and death; fever and delirium succeeded her death-like trance and her life was despaired of. A strong constitution, however, triumphed and she recovered; but oh, how altered! The pale, thin face, seen now under a close widow's cap, was so wan and sad that few would have cognized the once blooming Florence.

Her sole comfort, now, seemed to lie in the children, his children. She would hardly allow them out of her sight, and the whole time was spent in instructing and amusing them.

Florence Langford had been a widow jus ne year. It was a bright summer's day, and she sat in the same little parlor where she had first heard of her husband's loss. Willie and Edith were seated on the floor beside her, blowing soap bubbles. Florence sat watching their nnocent delight as the sun shone on the pretty globes, and reflected prismatic colors in them and then her thoughts flew back over the last three years, sadder and sadder grew the pale face, until Willie noticed it, and leaving his play went softly to her side; Edith knelt beside him, with her face laid caressingly against Florence's hand. 'Tell us about papa,' whispered Willie. 'When is papa coming back?' asked Edith.

'He stays so long.' 'Hush, Edith,' said Willie. 'Papa can never ing her arm around Willie, the three talked about papa for an hour; how much longer they would have remained in that position I cannot tell. Jessie interrupted them; her whole face was beaming with joy.

'Floy,' she whispered, kneeling on the stoo at her cousin's feet, and untying her cap, 'take this off for a minute.'

'Why Dessie?' asked Floy, suffering her to 'Because it is stiff and unbecoming,' said Jessie, who was loosening Floy's hair, and twisting it over her fingers into old curls. 'You must never wear it again.' Dear Jessie, give it back to me. I shall always wear it.' 'But I say you shall never put it on again

dear Florence, a widow's cap is needless now! Jessie,' cried Florence, starting up, and looking into her cousin's face, while she trembled iolently, 'what do you mean?' 'Can you bear the best of news, Floy?' said

Jessie, softly. 'George-'. Jessie in answer threw open the door, and said gayly: 'Come in!' and in another moment, Florence was in her husband's arms, and the two children were looking in a kind of joyfu astonishment at their father.

All was soon explained. George Langford had been among the passengers taken to Calcutta, and had, from some mistake of the reporters, been put in the list of missing. Cold and exposure had brought on an attack of brain fever, and he had been very ill. "As soon as he was able, he had started for home, but the voyage had taken several months; and, after reaching England, he was detained some days before starting for America. He was there at last, and a happier party never met than the one that evening at Cak Lodge, Mr. Lawson's country

How to be Happy.

I will give you one or two good rules which may help you to become happier than you would be without knowing them; but as to being completely happy, that you can never be till you get to heaven.

The first is, 'try your best to make others happy.' 'I never was happy,' said a certain king, 'till I began to take pleasure in the welfare of my people; but ever since then, in the darkest day, I have had sunshine in my heart.' My second rule is, 'Be content with little. There are many good reasons for this rule. We deserve but little, we require but little, 'and without him; she looked back upon two years better is little, with the fear of God, than great treasures and trouble therewith.' Two men were determined to be rich, but they set about stood at the window watching, as if she expecthis means to his desires, while the other did roused her, and she stifled her own grief, and his best to bring down his desires to his means went to amuse and comfort them. Making Himself Useful.

During the session of 1796-'97, a wealthy erchant in conformity with the custom of time, gave a dinner party to a few gentleman, among whom was a member of Congress of that period. On the appointed day, however, the lady of the ouse was somewhat annoyed at an early hour, by the intrusion of an old man at the door .-Having been met by a servant, he inquired if the proprietor of the house-whom we will call Mr. Trophan-was at home? Upon receiving : egative reply, and furthermore informed that he would not be at home for some three or four hours, the old man said-'Well, being as I am here, I may as well re nain until he comes.'

'Please wait a moment,' said the servant, 'I will call Mrs. Trophan to the door and see what she will say.'

The servant then ran and called the mer chant's wife, who made her appearance. The old man then repeated what he had said to the Fine Groceries, Teas, Wines, Liquors servant-that being as he was there he might as well remain until her husband came.

'Well,' replied Mrs. T., 'if you will stay, jus walk through the alley and go back to the kitch-
